Not illustrated. 1907 Excerpt: . to fall and to flounder again as we faced each other for yet another struggle. Little by little, however, the fact that I was lither of limb, and in better training, began to tell. Hols was not now so much breathing heavily, as finding it difficult to breathe at all. His face, which had been flushed with passion, was now of an ashy grey, and as he rose in what proved to be the final bout, his bulky body swayed painfully, as if the very effort to stand were too much for his exhausted strength. But his grit was wonderful. Game to the last, he shaped manfully as I approached, watching my opportunity to grip him by the waist to throw him. As I stooped to effect my purpose, he struck out, dealing me a buffet which, had it taken me, as he had intended, upon the forehead--full on, instead of sideways upon the ear--might have killed me, and in any case must have ended the fight. Even as it was, the blow knocked out most of my remaining sense, and when, his foot slipping under him as he struck, he fell upon his back, I had scarcely sufficient strength, or sufficient sense, left to avail myself of my opportunity. Hardly knowing what I did, I stumbled forward blindly, falling, more by luck than by any intention of mine, upon his prostrate body and so by the weight of my own body holding him down...
